About The Oregon Review of International Law

The Oregon Review of International Law (ORIL) is a student-run journal of the University of Oregon School of Law that publishes articles by academics, practitioners, and students that address current legal topics in international law and policy.

International law increasingly plays a significant role in domestic law, politics, and everyday life. An understanding and appreciation of international law is necessary for a complete understanding of the national legal landscape. As the volumes of international treaties continue to grow, ORIL seeks to publish timely articles that describe the legal aspects of these treaties and the responsibilities they impose on national governments. ORIL addresses human rights, taxation, environmental issues, and a wide variety of other international legal topics.

What's included in the current online subscription model?

Current content provides online access to each new issue as soon as it becomes available. Online access also includes all historical volumes of the journal, making the entire archive fully searchable in an online format.

What's in Hein's "current content model"?

Our current content model contains the most recent volume of the journal published, and is the only place where those issues can be found online. Once the most recent volume is published, all previous volumes will become part of the historical back file.

How will I know when new articles are available in the current online subscription?

You can create an eTOC alert using a MyHein account in HeinOnline. After creating an eTOC alert for the title, you will receive an email notification alerting you when new content is added. The email will contain the table of contents for the issue and a link to the article(s).

Are you subscribed to HeinOnline's Law Journal Library?

If you subscribe to The Oregon Review of International Law in the current online subscription model and you are subscribed to HeinOnline's Law Journal Library, the full text of the current articles will be fully integrated and accessible directly from within your Law Journal Library subscription. This means you can search across all articles of the journal in conjunction with all other law review articles in the Law Journal Library. You can browse to the title and access the full text of every historical volume and article from within the Law Journal Library. Lastly, you can quickly link to other law review articles that are cited in The Oregon Review of International Law if they are available in HeinOnline.
